Italian bravery is measured by strange standards. The Piedmontese authorities in Rome have just conferred the highest recognition on King Humbert for civic valor. Our readers will be anxious to know what act of heroism secured this reward. It is easily explained. Two houses caught fire at noon in Rome some months since; the inmates left the houses when the flames were noticed. The king was passing. He remained for two or three hours on the street and now and then suggested to the men of the fire department where it might be advisable to turn on a stream of water. No one was in any danger; not a fireman had his whiskers singed.

The Western Agriculturist very pertinently asks: "Has the high price of seed led farmers to provide more shelter and more comfortable quarters for the farm stock, to save the feed and hay? This year shelter is cheaper than feed. Still, too much of the farm stock is exposed day and night to the storm and cold, regardless of this well known principle. But if not for money and our own self-interest, when will our farmers learn to be humane, for the humane interest of every true nobleman seeks to care for every dumb animal under his care with the kind and generous hand of the man who loves his animals?"

First Walter—"Why do you always say 'thank you sir' to that old skinflint when he goes out after lunch, although he never gives you a cent."

Second Walter—"I don't want the other guests to find out he doesn't tip me, for fear they will follow his example. See?"—(Epoch).
